On today's scan, we are unable to tell whether your pregnancy is progressing.

An explanation for patients

What does intrauterine pregnancy of uncertain viability on today's scan mean?

It means we are able to see a pregnancy sac in the womb (so not ectopic) but the sac is either too small to expect to see an embryo (the baby) or the embryo can be seen but is too small for us to expect to see a heartbeat.

Often the pregnancy is perfectly fine, it is just that on today's scan you are too early for us to see the heartbeat. This is especially likely if the scan has been done at less than six weeks since your last period or you are less pregnant than you thought. However, in some cases it may mean that the pregnancy has failed at an early stage and not developed any further. In other words, a miscarriage has occurred.

What will happen next?

To confirm what is happening we need to repeat your scan in 10 to 14 days (depending what we have seen on your first scan). We know this will be an anxious wait for you but performing a scan earlier may lead to another inconclusive result which would not be helpful.

If the pregnancy is not developing as it should it is possible that pain and bleeding may increase while waiting for the next scan.

What do I do at home?

Going home without knowing whether your pregnancy is continuing can be very difficult. If you haven't told anyone about your pregnancy this may be a good time to confide in someone who can support you. Some women prefer to continue to work because they like the distraction, others need a few days at home. This may depend on how much bleeding and pain you have.

Do I need to come to hospital if I have more bleeding or pain?

If you develop increasing cramping, lower abdominal pain and heavier bleeding it may be a sign that you are miscarrying. Sadly, there is nothing we can do in hospital to stop this from happening and you may be more comfortable staying at home if you feel confident to do so.

Paracetamol can be taken to help with pain relief, one to two tablets every four to six hours, or up to eight tablets in 24 hours. However, if at any stage the bleeding or pain become unmanageable despite painkillers you need to attend your Emergency Department immediately.

We often explain that soaking more than two large sanitary pads an hour for two consecutive hours may be a sign that you are bleeding too heavily and need to be assessed.

How will I know if I am miscarrying?

Some women may experience only light bleeding, but some describe heavy bleeding for a couple of hours with clots. This may be much more than your usual period. Some women describe period pain whilst others describe labour type contractions.

You may or may not see the pregnancy sac or tissue if you are experiencing heavy loss and if you are unsure what to do please call us. We are happy for you to bring the tissue to us and we can care for it under our hospital guidelines or discuss other options with you.

What happens next?

We would like to see you again, as arranged, so that we can rescan you. The time we need to wait between scans will depend on the stage of pregnancy your scan is showing today.

If you have further heavy bleeding, increased pain or you want advice on your symptoms you can contact us, via the telephone numbers below, and we can assess if an earlier appointment for you is necessary. Alternatively further information on signs and symptoms can be found on NHS choices (<https://www.nhs.uk/pages/home.aspx>) or from The Miscarriage Association website.

It is probably wise to avoid strenuous exercise at present. If you have any worries and would like further help or advice from this clinic, please telephone:
